Crime is on the rise, the economy is in tatters, civil liberties under assault, and the rule of law has been subverted. With no end in sight, can India’s democracy take another hit? New Delhi, India, 28/11/2018: After decades of Hindu nationalism and Hindutva, India is facing a crisis of political representation and lopsided governance. All three poles of Indian politics are in danger: democracy and liberalism are in the midst of a crisis, not only due to the most recent bout of hate speech, but also because the Bharatiya Janata Party, which has governed the country for over a decade, has no solution to provide. The Congress, long believed to be the guardian of India’s secularism and commitment to human rights, is reeling under its failure to provide a credible alternative. However, if India’s democratic system is saved, it must be led by a new generation of individuals who are able to set aside their personal ambitions and build a new political order that will protect the foundations of Indian democracy. Today the nation is roiled by fundamentalism, nationalism and hate. With no end in sight, can India’s democracy take another hit? Jawaharlal Nehru was opposed to many of the ideas that now dominate the Congress party, and he held a strong view about the freedom and rights of women. Mohandas Gandhi was an ardent Hindu nationalist, which was shocking in India of the 1920s, but in a way it can be said that Gandhi brought our nation to its modern state, most notably in the way he took forward the idea of independence for India in 1931. Nehru and Gandhi’s ideas, of course, were not the original ideas of the Congress
