In gasoline engine systems, it is desirable to measure various operating conditions in order to insure optimum performance of the engine. These conditions are for example, the air/fuel ratio, boost in a turbocharger, the temperature of the exhaust system, and the compression ratio of the engine. Typically, these operating conditions are measured by using sensors. It is known to utilize fuel injection into an engine as a means to control the air/fuel ratio, boost in a turbocharger, and to measure the exhaust temperature. In an injection type fuel system, the fuel is delivered to the injectors through a pressure reducing fuel delivery system. A characteristic of such systems is that the fuel delivery pressure is only a function of the power required to operate the injectors. The fuel delivery pressure can vary about an average pressure for a given application with variations in the system from engine to engine. Systems are known wherein various engine operating conditions are measured by sensors which are located in the exhaust system. In such a system, the sensors can provide an indication of a temperature of the exhaust system. However, no direct measurement of the air/fuel ratio or of the compression ratio of the engine is normally possible. In fuel injection systems, a conventional means of providing an indication of the air/fuel ratio is to measure the voltage across a resistor connected in series with the fuel delivery system, and to provide the value of the voltage as an air/fuel ratio signal, as disclosed in U.S. Pat. No. 3,541,913. In addition to producing an air/fuel ratio signal, such systems produce a pressure drop across the resistor which, if connected as in the '913 patent, is at a fixed value independent of the fuel delivery pressure. The voltage level represents the fuel delivery pressure and is measured directly without the use of fuel injectors. A problem with a fixed resistor connected to the fuel delivery system is that it is relatively inaccurate

Nigerian Government : 10 Billion Electronic Voting Machines Will be Imported by Next Year Bolaji Onori, a commissioner of the elections in Oyo State, said the machines will be imported in time for the 2011 elections The federal government will import 10 billion electronic voting machines next year to be used for the 2011 general elections, said Bolaji Onori, a commissioner of elections in Oyo state, who disclosed this on Thursday. He said, "We will be sending 10 billion machines to the State immediately after the 2010 general elections, which we are expecting to be held at the end of this year.” “The state and federal governments will fund 80 percent of the cost while the remaining 20 percent will be borne by the Federal Electoral Commission (FEC) from the money paid by candidates,” he said. The commissioner said because there are fewer registered voters, the voting machines will be used to count votes in places such as local government areas where a few people lived. He said while the various development councils were also likely to be upgraded to become the state, such plans were still at a “preparatory level”. Onori added that the population of the state was poised to increase by 13 percent by 2011, and that there would be more registered voters as a result. The commissioner said the government would look at the legislative framework for elections in the state to ensure that the country went to elections without fear.
